

The OD Practitioner is changing its name to the Organization Development Review!

Over the past 50 years the OD Practitioner has evolved from a newsletter to, what we believe is, one of the highest quality outlets of articles about theories, models, and practices for creating great teams and organizations, developing talent, designing work, and the change practices to make those happen. In the past five years the journal has provided an outlet for both blind-reviewed articles, and for articles by authors who want guidance from our outstanding editorial board, consisting of senior OD practitioners and academics. We span the academic-practitioner divide, and we think our articles are as good or better than journals like the Harvard Business Review, Sloan Management Review, or Organization Dynamics, but lacks the reputation and readership they enjoy.

To better position the journal for an expanded, global readership, and to better signal the quality and editorial rigor that goes into every issue, As of January 2019, we are changing our name to the Organization Development Review. We are not changing anything else about the kinds of articles we publish, editorial policies or practices, because we already produce an outstanding journal. If it's been a while since you have read our journal, and would like to see a few recent issues, just send an email to The Editor in Chief, John.Vogelsang@queenscollege.cuny.edu .

We are indexed by EBSCO: Business Source Complete and Academic Search Complete, and we invite contributions that speak to scholarly practitioners and practical scholars interested in developing organizations and the teams and people in them. You can find Guidelines for Authors at <https://www.odnetwork.org/page/SubGuidelinesODP>